ANTEDATED EDISON.

An Ore Separating Machine Invented by a Brooklynite in 1891.

The description in the Eagle of Edison's new ore separating machine on Thursday last has brought out the information that Edison is not the only inventor who has tried his hand at this work. Sylvester Chichester, of 357 Myrtle avenue, in conjunction with Richard M. Moffat of this city patented in 1891 the so-called Moffat & Chichester machine. It was largely the invention of Mr. Moffat, Mr. Chichester having helped him in developing and perfecting it. The Edison machine separates ore by attracting the particles in one direction and the gangue or residue falls in an opposite direction through force of gravity.

In the Moffat & Chichester machine the separation is performed by attraction. This machine was made for the separation of magnetic oxide of iron from the gangue as it appears in nature. The invention consists in a novel combination of an electro magnet or magnets, the poles of which are stationary within rotating drums. The arrangement produces a strong concentration of the magnetic lines of force between the drums at their lower half. All magnetic particles falling into the field of force are attracted toward the periphery of the drum and are conveyed out of that field by the rotating drums to a point where they pass into a suitable receptacle, separate from that into which the non-magnetic particles pass. The iron particles are thus attracted by both drums which contain the magnets, and the refuse matter is allowed to fall from the center into a separate receptacle. The capacity of the machine is 200 tons a day, and will, it is claimed, extract 99 per cent of all the ore.

This machine was exhibited in Brooklyn and New York in 1891, and was subsequently taken to the coast of Maine, where it was used. Mr. Chichester claims that his machine compares favorably, as to quality of work, with the Edison machine. Edison's invention, however, is on a larger scale and can turn out 1,000 to 2,000 tons of pure ore per day. This is because it contains larger magnets, larger receptacles, and consequently can take in a larger amount of ore at one time.

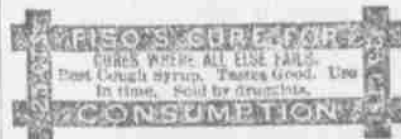

The process of separating magnetic ore by the means of electro magnets has been known for some ten years, according to Mr. Chichester's statement.—Brooklyn Eagle.

The M. & C.

There is a strong likelihood that the Southern will soon be operating the Memphis & Charleston railroad. This road is a most valuable property, its bonds being worth 120 on the market. The Memphis & Charleston is now being operated by receivers, and there is being made a strong effort to force the property to a sale, presumably for the benefit of the Southern.

Public Baptism.

Quite a concourse of people assembled at the river Sunday, and the ceremony of baptism by immersion was performed by Rev. R. S. Umbarger, Pastor of the M. E. Church, South. Amanda Curtis, being the recipient.
